According to the American Diabetes Association, diabetes has become a major health problem in the United States and throughout the world. According to the American Diabetes Association, 29 million people in the United States have been diagnosed with diabetes and this number is predicted to increase to 35 million by the year 2010. The total health care costs and loss of productivity in the United States associated with diabetes were estimated to be $132 billion in 1994. The total projected health care costs associated with diabetes in the United States in 2010 are predicted to be $188 billion dollars. Type I diabetes, also referred to as insulin dependent diabetes mellitus (IDDM) is due to the lack of insulin production in the beta cells of the pancreas. Type II diabetes, also referred to as non-insulin dependent diabetes mellitus (NIDDM), develops when the body is unable to make enough or properly use insulin. Insulin is a hormone that regulates sugar, fat and protein metabolism, and helps the body use the energy stores in the food we eat. Insulin is produced by beta cells in the pancreas. In type I diabetes, the beta cells of the pancreas are destroyed making insulin a non-functional protein. In type II diabetes, the beta cells become resistant to insulin, or are unable to produce insulin in response to a normal amount of blood glucose. Both types of diabetes are characterized by high blood sugar and excess sugar in the urine. Type I diabetes typically occurs in childhood or adolescence. The cause of type I diabetes is unknown. Type Ia diabetes can be hereditary but in most cases, is not. Babies with this disease are typically diagnosed within one year of life. Type Ia diabetes occurs in people of all races and ethnic backgrounds. Management of type I diabetes is complex and may require one or more of: dietary changes, insulin therapy, self monitoring of blood glucose levels, and/or administration of supplementary hormones (such as glucagon or growth hormones). Complications of diabetes include nerve damage (resulting in tingling, numbness and pain) in
